Culture & Heritage are the key components that help build the identity of an individual and of a large group of people and the spaces they inhabit. Indian cities boost of cultural heritage within their urban fabric; embedded in their morphological conditions. The development in the Indian cities responds to the socio-cultural identities that have forged over the years during the process of urbanization. The cultural heritage is assimilation of indigenous knowledge systems, rituals, practices and lifestyle pattern of the communities and reflects within the territories shaped and conceived.

'Contemporary architectural education evolved from the Technical Schools established by the colonial government in the 1850s. They supplanted the traditional system of the master craftsmen who had passed their knowledge from one generation to another. Unlike Europe where industrialisation transformed traditional skills and knowledge systems over time, in India no attempt was made to transform the traditional system of building which was instead, purposively by-passed by colonial builders.' (Menon, A.G.K., 1998) As we progress, there is a continuous need to reinvent and rethink the process to approach the discipline of architecture and urban studies. The context changes and with that the process of learning and unlearning becomes critical. This requires academicians to adapt to newer forms and narratives of architectural pedagogy. The need to create a larger framework with interdisciplinary approaches becomes important as architecture is no more a stand-alone entity.

Data driven approaches & toolkits and data visualization tools have become necessary to decipher the urban complexities. The digital innovations and interfaces that are universal in approach can evoke larger participation from the local communities in the domain of urban studies. The availability of plugins for urban studies on various digital platforms, penetration of Artificial Intelligence (AI) and inclusion of multiple programming languages have changed the dynamics of collection, analysis, management and execution of urban data. This provides an opportunity to address the need to discuss, develop and test a digital approach and model based intervention which can act as a prototype for the future studies fostering community engagement and people centric approach in policy framework.

Today with our unprecedented and rapid urbanization, half of the world population lies in cities. We are all in need for a new paradigm for shaping our cities. Our vision of the city, unfortunately, blindly conforms to western-centric ideals and does not leave any space for the "disarray" attributed to Indian cities. The aspiration for a 'world class global city' that is generally subscribed to, obliterates many aspects of an informal place, specifically, cultural, slightly riotous, but robust that is any Indian city. The overlap of formal and informal economic sectors reflects and manifests itself in the morphology of the cities and often is a site for conflict and contradictions. Our built environment is being converted into one large narrative of social segregation and alienation propelling us to a future perpetuated by market-based decision making. As architects, planners, shapers of the built environment can we bring back the question of equity, social justice and ecological sustainability to the table?

We are according to some people in the age of the 'Anthropocene'. We have experienced so many intense paradigm shifts over the last 200 years and these changes brought about by human activities/ interventions have altered and influenced climate change and the environment. There is a certain urgency with relation to climate change, extinction of biodiversity, ocean acidification, afforestation, emissions. Through their involvement in the development process and in creating and managing the built environment, urban designers, architects and planners are sometimes the 'first' in line perpetrators of environment. There is this conflict of meeting of human needs, aspirations as against environmental sustainability and these need to be negotiated and balanced. As shapers of the built environment how can we address these issues and minimize the damage to natural habitat and bring about environmental sustainability.

Urban governance and policy seeks to discuss the decision making approaches and management strategies in the urban domain. Inclusive design strategies and measures in the recent past have amplified significant implementation which makes the built environment equitable and accessible to all. Development and sustenance of the city depends on an effective governance in action in accordance with various stages. The decentralization of power in the civic domain in India has enhanced the role of urban local bodies. Thus, more opportunities and role of citizens through equitable participation, decision making and implementation guidelines are the attributes of discussion. The study further seeks to discuss innovative methods and strategies aimed at enhancing urban development and quality of life for the citizens. With the help of relevant case examples, causes and issues in the domain of inclusive urban governance can be initiated through an effective dialogue.
